

INT. REPAIR SHOP - LATE AFTERNOON

An empty shop. Except for an eight-foot workbench. TESS, 34, peels old tape off its legs. Her brother CAL, 29, measures the top. A small rented van waits outside.

CAL
Eight feet.

TESS
You booked the six-foot van.

He measures again. She watches the wall clock: 5:56.

CAL
It was cheaper.

Cal retracts the tape. Too fast. It cracks against the case.

TESS
New tenant gets the keys at six.

CAL
He can have a free bench.

TESS
She needs the floor space.

Cal runs a thumb over a black crescent scorched into the wood.

CAL
You left the iron on.

TESS
You called me outside to see a fox.

CAL
It was a fox.

Tess lifts a handsaw from her bag. Cal spots a pencil line across the middle of the bench.

CAL
When did you mark that?

TESS
Tuesday.

CAL
You said you needed help moving.

Tess sets the saw on the pencil line.

TESS
I do.

CAL
You could have told me.

TESS
Would you have come?

Cal studies the bench. A pair of legs at each end. Nothing supporting the middle.

CAL
You'll need legs.

TESS
I've got four in the car.

CAL
A whole new bench, then.

TESS
Same top.

Cal slides two tall packing crates under the pencil line, one on either side.

CAL
Put the scorch mark on your side.

TESS
That was the plan.

He presses down on the far half. Solid.

CAL
Mine will fit in the kitchen.

Tess lifts the saw. Stops.

TESS
There's a vise bolted underneath.

CAL
I'll eat at the other end.

She makes the first stroke. The saw catches. Cal shifts his weight to steady the wood.

The next stroke is clean. They find a rhythm.

The clock clicks to 5:57.
